COVER STORY 16

INDIA'S SILICON SUNRISE

Driven by geopolitical realities and national security concerns, India is implementing an ambitious plan to build a semiconductor ecosystem. Will it succeed in its high-stakes mission?

INTERVIEW

If we come up with our own technology, facilities and production capacity at the earliest, we can compliment the efforts of the US in a big way by providing them low-cost chip manufacturing: V.K. Saraswat, member, NITI Aayog and the advisory committee of India's Semiconductor Mission

PLUS

India cannot aim for complete self-sufficiency in semiconductors: Pranay Kotasthane, deputy director and chairperson, high-tech geopolitics programme, Takshashila Institution

India is making strides, but our reliance on imports will not diminish overnight: V. Veerappan, chairman, India Electronics and Semiconductor Association

India's dealings with the US, from the outset of this second Trump innings, have been cool, calm and collected. Without any fanfare, or any retaliatory statements, or counter tariffs, Prime Minister Narendra Modi and his team have worked with the US behind the scenes, in an understated manner aimed at seeking solutions
